Israeli Offensive Military in the South of Gaza: Normalization of Violence and Fatalism

The normalization of the mass deaths caused by the Israeli army in the south of Gaza has led to a sense of fatalism among the local population, according to Sam Rose, director of planning of the agency of Palestinian relief Unrwa.

Rose made these declarations after a school in Unrwa in Nuseirat was bombed by the Israeli forces, leaving at least 33 dead, including 12 women and children.

"When the whole world lives in overcrowded and overpopulated conditions, we have always said that it would be inevitable that incidents like the one that occurred last night at the school in Nuseirat."

Violations of the Rules of War

Rose, recently returned to London after five weeks in Gaza, said: "There were about 6,000 people sheltered in that school. There are rules of war to which we call on all parties in the conflict to adhere: to protect the inviolability of our installations. There are also principles of distinction and proportionality."

"The people would have been sheltered in the schoolyard in the most desperate conditions and there would have been no warning that this attack would take place. It occurred in the middle of the night, around 2 am."

Rose pointed out that this type of incidents has become so common that they have almost become normalized. In previous conflicts, a single incident like this would have caused shock and indignation and would have been remembered forever. However, in this conflict, it seems that it will be replaced by another in a few days or less. For this reason, it almost becomes a daily and routine thing that these things are happening. We have normalized the horror."
